her worthy of a better fate than that of the wretched suicide.

It is curious to know what first induced her to assume the garb and occupation of a man, and what powerful agency it was that enabled her to remain faithful to the line of duty she had thus marked out for herself. There are instances innumerable where the influence of love, or a romantic disposition, has clothed the form of woman with male attire, and sustained her amid the perits of the battle-field, in the dangers of the deep, or in wild venture in foreign lands; but we know of no other case in history or tradition where a woman has wonderfully repressed her own feelings and natural disposition, so completely assumed habits of a man, and been so successful in evading the prying curiosity of the world. "Harry Stokes has indeed played her part so cleverly that it is with the greatest difficulty we have been enabled to glean the following facts, which, meagre as they as they are, throw some little light on her past history.

She was the daughter of a bricklayer in a village in the neighborhood of Doncaster Before she could well between with some of the woughest and toughest work in that hard-brought days. Little Harriet Stokes's lines had not been laid in pleasant places. She was so ground down by the iron hand at home that, when she was about eight years old, she put on tattered suit of boy a clothing and walked orth in the "wide, wide world." Arrived at he village of Whitby, she looked for work. The hard treatment of arents ignorant of their responsibility, had friven her from the protection of home and rom all the associations which should enchain the young mind to home. That she was not the bread of idleness. The hard treatment of arents ignorant of their responsibility, had friven her from the protection of home and row all the associations which should enchain as young mind to home. Nº. 2.107

Our readers will remember an account of the murder, last summer, of Mr. Joseph Charles one of the principal citizens of St. Louis, by W. Thornton, an ex-bank clerk, who had bee several years before tried and acquitted, our charge of robbing the bank in which he will employed, and on whose trial Mr. Charless hat testified against him. As announced by telegraph, the execution of Thornton took place of Friday last. On that day, the prisoner around from his couch early, and at once began his preparations to meet the fate that awaited him. He seemed more sheerful and better dispesse than on the previous evening, and announce that he had given up every yestige of his desir to live. He did not even inquire if anythin had been heard from the Governor, and whe he was told that a dispatch had been receive from Jefferson City stating that no Executive interference with the sentence need be expected, he manifested no astonishment, disappoint ment, nor grief. He had been much comforted. nt, nor grief. He had been much comfort sustained by a letter from one of his siste
